In an environment of rapid change, it's more important than ever to be intentional about your time, goals, and actions so that every person makes the greatest impact.

Action 1: Include

Build Better Performance on a Foundation of Inclusivity

Diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI) is more than policies, programs, or headcounts. Equitable employers outpace their competitors by respecting the unique needs, perspectives, and potential of all team members. Consequently, diverse and inclusive workplaces earn deeper trust and more commitment from their employees. The results of that commitment mean greater organizational success.

When people feel safe and respected, they're more likely to bring their best effort, maximizing their impact and your organization's results.

In a 2019 analysis, McKinsey & Company found that companies in the top quarter of gender-diverse executive teams were 25 percent more likely to experience above-average profitability than peer companies with less executive diversity. This is up from 21 percent in 2017 and 15 percent in 2014. According to the World Economic Forum's DEI 4.0 report, companies that lead their geography and industry for diversity and inclusivity perform better than their market average in areas like innovation, profitability, decision-making, and employee retention.

Leaders have the power to break barriers and become DEI catalysts within organizations. As leaders prioritize inclusion, increase belonging, and focus on engagement, they create a team environment where everybody can thrive. These inclusive environments help all team members feel comfortable being their authentic selves and excited to help others feel the same.

Leaders can begin with simple, actionable steps that reflect how they lead each individual, such as adopting a growth mindset about each team member, building intentional connections with each person on their team, and raising the visibility of frontline contributors through recognition and advocacy. When people feel safe and respected, they're more likely to bring their best effort, maximizing their impact and your organization's results.

Keep other aspects of inclusivity in mind as you continue to build workplace inclusion. Understanding bias traps and working on rewiring leaders' decision-making, for example, make practices such as hiring, advancement, and professional development opportunities the result of a more conscientious approach that gives everyone an opportunity to succeed.

Grounding your leadership approach in inclusivity will ensure your organization gets the best from its people by giving the best to its people, moving culture and performance to a new level.

Action 2: Engage

Connect Your People With Outcome-Focused Experiences

Leaders can amplify organizational impact by rallying people around principle-based professional development and growth opportunities—experiences that not only build new skillsets but also strengthen the backbone of your organization by investing in your people.

When exceptional leaders communicate shared vision and strategy, they encourage others to work toward goals that advance their organization's initiatives. Leaders who build high-trust, inclusive teams achieve success by engaging people with opportunities to develop themselves. As your team members grow in their professional roles, they can help your organization transform and thrive in alignment with your organization's greater vision.

Strengthen your organization's backbone by investing in your people.

Providing teams with outcome-focused learning activities can help them grow as people and employees so they can have a greater impact in their personal and professional spheres. As you develop a custom action plan that uses the right tools, you can engage your teams in ways that help the whole organization reach new levels of success.

“When people work with a leader who is excited about professional development, they see growth opportunities as a personal and organizational win. As people begin a learning process, leaders can help make their development process successful by giving teams the ability to gauge their progress through quantifiable results”, says Will Houghteling, EVP of product & platforms at FranklinCovey.

Leaders can also encourage their people's engagement by selecting learning and development (L&D) programs that are anchored in learning science as well as workplace learning. Training tools, such as 360 assessments, that help people see where they're strongest and where they have room for improvement allow them to apply their learning over time to the most critical areas.

With modeling, coaching, development, and practice, professional development opportunities can help individuals work more effectively and teams increase their impact across your organization.

Action 3: Transform

Align Projects With High-Value Results

Organizations achieve high-impact work when leaders clarify what meaningful project results look like. Leaders are also uniquely positioned to build relationships and buy-in across teams to ensure new initiatives are successful. By establishing that projects are focused around high-value initiatives and deliverables that move the needle on an organization's most important objectives, leaders can transform results.

Successful leadership is about getting people to work together and give their best effort to your organization's most important goals.

Because successful leadership is about getting people to work together and volunteer their best efforts, here are ways to transform these efforts into high-value results:

Create

Create a framework that keeps everyone's time and effort focused on the initiatives that matter most to your organization. When team members know the purpose behind a project's objectives, they not only become committed to its success—they also choose actions that drive organizational outcomes forward.

Define

Be clear about your key objectives and results from the start. Well-defined targets and benchmarks help leaders remove blockers or confusion areas that can hold teams back along the way.

Align

Ensure leaders across your organization are aligned on project goals. By helping teams understand how individual work responsibilities connect with overall project progress and success, leaders can empower their people to perform even better.

Close

As an organization performs high-impact work that contributes to high-value results, leaders should emphasize project successes. Acknowledging well-executed projects and their results encourages people to continue effective behaviors and bolsters organization-wide support.

Amplify Your Leadership Impact With Intentionality

Exceptional leaders who amplify their organization's impact see their people and programs transform, even in challenging circumstances. By adopting and applying the principles of human effectiveness with intention, leaders will build inclusive environments, keep their team members engaged, and provide strategic focus to every project, improving organizational culture and performance. This approach moves organizations forward because it's rooted in the individual—supporting each person and harnessing their unique strengths to help the whole team achieve more in every situation. And there's never a better time to amplify greatness than now.
